Agents uncover 9.6 million dollars in an oil drum

July 2012

Agents have uncovered 9.6 million dollars in an oil drum they say was stashed by local cattle rustlers. The agents discovered a “false floor” in a horse stall at the Rocking L Ranch located in the Pilot Point area. Agents are trying to locate previous employees of the ranch which was leased by Bob Harold Leach and [REDACTED]. Agents will not give any other information other than they will begin their investigation by interviewing Anna [REDACTED] who was supposedly a manager of the ranch along with Neil [REDACTED] who was known as the head wrangler along with countless others that they feel were involved.

Agent Mack Miller of the Federal Bureau of Investigation commented, “It’s still very early in the investigation but we feel there was a lot more going on at the Rocking L Ranch than just cattle rustling. The original investigation was rushed, and some things were overlooked. By uncovering the drums of money, we have found evidence that Mr. Leach may have taken the fall for countless others which led to an unfair trial for him.” Agent Miller did say that the case is ongoing and finding the oil drum was just the tip of the iceberg. “We have reason to believe that the couple was extorting several banks and more people were involved which has led us to opening a new investigation at this time. We have every intention of interviewing the employees at the time of the Rocking L Ranch along with others. “

Agent Miller would not go into detail but did say that he received an anonymous tip from a caller saying that the couple had friends in the “underground world” and gave specific information about the false floor in a horse stall at the ranch. More to come as details unfold.
